

Mario Aguilera Piceno

Professor Fricke

English 101

12 February 2025

Writing Process Initial Draft

Writing processes can help shape the way one understands how to write efficiently and with reason. The processes one has of writing are beneficial when it comes to trying to get their point across or when writing to solve a problem. For me personally, my current writing process ranges from setting up a goal behind why I am writing, to making use of notetaking and writing practice. These processes have shaped the way I write today in the way that I am able to do so with motive and ease.

Getting one's point across or trying to solve a problem with writing can be made easier when one has personal writing processes set up. An example of this would be setting up a mindset of certain criteria that a person can use before and during their writing. In this case, this mindset could consist of setting up a goal as to why it is that they are writing. This goal can be in the form of getting a point across, making it so that it can be used to make their writing less stressful as it allows them to focus on getting that point across. This goes to show that by making use of a personal writing process, one can make it easier to write with ease.

One part of my personal writing process stems from setting up goals behind my writing. Setting up goals is useful to me because they allow me to have a clear motive as to why and what I am writing for. An example of this being useful to me is when I am writing to solve a problem related to programming, a hobby I like to do on my free time. The problem can stem from trying to find a reason behind why I am writing a program, to trying to find a reason behind why my program isn't working as intended. In this case, the writing goal can be made useful to keep it clear as to what and why I am writing for.

Notetaking is another thing that I make use of greatly in my personal writing process. This is important to me and the way I write because it allows me to write with ease in the form of writing thoughts down and using those written down thoughts to resolve why it is that I am writing. An example that I could think of for this is brainstorming ideas about why something is the way it is. As ideas pour down, writing these ideas as they come into mind allow one to go back and utilize them to answer why that thing is the way it is. This goes to show that notetaking, especially for me personally, is something that can be useful when it comes to writing.

Practicing writing is another big part of my personal writing process. Practicing writing has allowed me to better understand and improve how it is that I write today. An example of this would be when I was writing a research essay regarding CO<sub>2</sub> emissions and their impact on our current climate, and I had to come up with a personal solution as to resolving the mass amounts of human derived CO<sub>2</sub> emissions. In this case, I had to practice implementing my personal solution to the research essay which allowed me to learn about transitioning topics in essays. This became useful to me along my general education classes as it allowed me to better understand how to seamlessly transition paragraphs that tie in to each other and my introductory claim. This goes to show that practicing writing can be a useful part of one's writing process.

Going back to what I said, writing processes are generally important to a person's ability to write efficiently and with reason. This was seen as I covered some of my personal writing processes that I currently use when writing today. This goes to show that writing processes can vary from person and generally shape the way one is able to write without having much trouble.